DISOBEYED HIS REQUEST MONEY FROM CONGRESS

Cleveland Wanted Olney to Pursue a Conservative Policy.

The President Was Willing to Let England Act as She Did Toward Nicaragua, But the Head of the State Department Followed His Own Aggressive Incitnations.

finish, 69 The probable retirement of Secretary Ofney from the Cabinet continues to be an absorbing topic of discussion in official circles. The story of differences of opinion Same in regarding a foreign policy that have arisen between the President and his Secretary of State, as told exclusively in The Times, is accepted with practical unaulmity as a conservative statement of the situation. There has never been any question but that the views of Secretary Oiney regarding the attitude to be assumed by the United States in regard to the pending boundary dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela have widely differed from those held by the President.

The latter has from the first insisted that the Venezuelan question should be handled by the State Department on preversy between England and Nicaraugua, TOOK A CONTRACT COURSE.

But this suggestion has not in any sense been carried into effect. An aggressive policy has on the contrary been inaugurated, from which the United States must eventually recede or prepare to meet force with force. This phase of the contingency, it now appears, was never contemparted by the President, and in this particular respect the Secretary of State has acted upon his own responsibility. Those iew in official circles who insist that the relations between Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Olney are of the most pleasant and barmonious character certainly do not waith the shadows that indicate conting events.

They seem to ignore the statement they seem to ignore the statement which is in every one's mouth that the two chief officials of the Government had what is alleged to have been a prolonged and heated conference in the Executive Mansion last Monday.

Mansion list Monday, From this consultation, it is declared, Secretary Olney emerged with his face flushed with anger, his teeth clinched, bends of perspiration standing on ris forebead, of perspiration standing on ris forchead, and giving every outward indication of laboring under great mental excitement.

It reminded the few casual spectators of these good old days preceding the resignation of James G. Blaine, when he left the presence of President Harrison with his face ashen, his hands slaking with reervousness and banging his silk hat against the wall as he passed down stairs.

At the very moment Mr. Olney left the

At the very moment Mr. Olney left the Executive Mansion the final arrangements for the visit of the President and his Cabinet to Atlanta were being completed, and the impression prevailed that the Secretary of State would remain in the city as the only representative of the Government. Instead of this he hastily collected a few Instead of this he hastily collected a few personal effects necessary for a journey and the same evening took a train for Boston. This incident might be construed to indicate harmony and friendly personal relations, but the average observer would interpret it as a family row of very respectable dimensions.

Since the entrance of Secretary Olicy intopublic life there has never been a shadow of doubt but that he possesses in an equal degree with Mr. Cleveland firmness, strength of character, the courage of his convictions and stability of backbone. He even rep-resents in a greater degree than the Presi-dent that principle of Americanism which made Mr. Blaine the most popular man of his time.

Should Mr. Olney be forced to retire from the Cabinet because of advocating a vigorons foreign policy, defending the Monroe doctrine, and protecting the property interests of American citizens abroad, he WILL BE SETTLED TO-NIGHT.
